Interesting Factoids About Midwest Airlines

Midwest Airlines has been fighting its way through the economic crisis just like every other company out there. Its natural and even good business sense to join with a partner to form something new and stronger. That is exactly what has happened with Midwest and Frontier airlines. They entered into a merger agreement in early 2010 that is expected to complete in about eighteen months time. Midwest has had its headquarters in Milwaukee, Wisconsin at the Billy Mitchell Airfield for a long time. Their service area was built to encompass about seventy destinations including offering flights to Mexico and Costa Rica. Now that they are teaming with Frontier, the future is looking brighter for both airlines. Also, are you searching for info on the [Navigator of the Seas? Whenever two companies merge, the process of transitioning various programs unique to each company is complex. A benefit of Midwest airlines is the Midwest Miles Mastercard service for customers. Many passengers have enjoyed earning extra miles by using their Midwest Miles card.

No need to worry about your accumulated miles. If you already have this card you will continue to earn miles for card purchases. What will ultimately happen is your card will transition to a Frontier Mastercard program with the same features near the end of 2010. Barclays Bank is the issuer for both carriers so the transition will be seamless. Midwest sets itself apart from the other typical regional carriers because they actually provide service to the destinations that are south of the border of the United States. While they do have flights to different destinations like Mexico, they also fly people to Costa Rica--a very popular vacation spot. None of Midwest's destinations will stop being served after the merger is finished. Its easy to find out where you can go in Mexico and Costa Rica if you visit the Midwest website. In addition to basic airfare and information about destinations, you can learn about how to travel internationally as well.

There are two corporate programs offered by Midwest, one of them is called Best Care Business program. Many businesses take advantage of such programs due to the high volume of air travel that is business related. One reason to use the BCB program is the Award Points they issue based on the number of tickets bought by the company. Another great benefit is the individual business traveler that earns EarlyReturns Frequent Flier miles alongside their other membership benefits. The Best Care Business Program is structured so both the parent company as well as the individual business person both benefit. The current economic climate has forced lots of airlines through hard times. Even though some airline carriers have experienced leaner times than this, Midwest has a positive outlook because they are merging with Frontier. This merger will help the company serve more destinations and increase their capital assets. The combination of Code sharing and merging with other airlines means more profitable business for Midwest/Frontier. As the merger continues to roll forward, a lot of exciting things will continue to happen. Before you go, remember to read this article Windjammer Cafe on Serenade of the Seas.
