The toughest part when selecting possible honeymoon locations isn't selecting the location itself, but selecting the right accommodation based off Net web sites.

One or two years gone when booking for my honeymoon location, I reserved hotel a reservation for a hotel suite in Florida through the Net. Being a real local of Ohio, meaning I do not leave Ohio really regularly ; I don't have many reliable ways of checking out a hotel. The Internet isn't always very reliable, as I found out when I arrived at the hotel in Florida and the hotel for wasn't the same hotel that I made reservations for. The hotel that was pictured on the internet site of the hotel I reserved a suite stood, in all its white spotless glory, next to the one which I reserved with, which really was not much to have a look at. This may have happened to you or someone you know and the experience may have left you wondering how can you avoid this from happening to you?

According to Susan Breslow Sardone, there are many things that can be done to turn your honeymoon location into one of the perfect locations you have ever experienced.

One of the first things to check for is, is the website easy to navigate? Most often you can tell a company's character by how they upkeep their site. Are there issues, links to pages with info that are not working? Or do they not tell you everything? Their reservation rates will be kept updated.

What do they say regarding the location? For instance, do they assert it is on the beach or merely a short walk from the beach? Do they assert it is in the money district? Chances are if they say it is just a short walk from the beach or if the hotel is located in the "financial district", the hotel isn't located as close to anything as you would like. There'll be plenty of driving concerned.

Are there children splashing excitedly in water (either the ocean or pool? IF you don't wish to go somewhere with a large amount of kids, steer clear of that particular hotel.

Does the hotel offer a "free breakfast" on their website? IF so, you should call to make sure not only what is offered as a part of the free breakfast, but also if it is offered for free through room service, and make sure gratuity is not attached. Gratuity usually is about 18% of the bill.

If you could answer yes to any of the four things to avoid above, then the hotel is not the perfect accommodation for your honeymoon location. Just hang in there, if you really want a particular location to be your honeymoon location, you'll find the right accommodation.
